Col. Latimer pulled the horses into the road again, and they drove on in silence. The reference to the feud brought Ringbrand back to things present, and the thought that he should not see Hesterngnin had a sharper sting as the time of his departure came nearer. He recalled the little incidents of their aequaintance, and tried to get some comfort out of the belief that her heart was still in her own keeping, and that the nain of rennuciation was going to be his not hers. The glance backward at the pleasant hours spent at the home of the Latimers reminded him that it would be ungracious to go away without making some acknowledge ment of the colonel's kindness, and he wondered how he could manage it without betraying his plans for inmediate retreat. Fortunately, the colonel himself opened the way by asking lam to become a guest at "The Laarels." "I told Tom Ludlow, day befo' yeste'day, that he was actin' mighty mean about it, and he sald he reckoned they-all could send you to us for a spell."

"I'm sure that's very good of you, colonel, and I thank you both for the invitation and for your many kindnesses to me since I came to Tregarthen: you certainly haven't let me feel that I was a stranger among you. I assure you, I would gladly accept the hospitulity of 'The Laurels' If-if my time were wholly my own; as it is not, I shall have to ask you to excuse me. I really ought to be in New York now."

"Well, I'm right sorry for that-'deed I am," replied the colouel; "I sort o' not the idea from Town you'd star down here and make a validate al ink and paper." "There's no end to your hospitality, colonel," replied Ringbrand, smiling at the thought of literary work in the house with Hester. "I suppose you'd be quite willing to have me turn 'The Laurels' luto a workshop; and I almost wish I could take you at your word, sellish as it would be. It would scarcely be possible, though: I shouldn't know how to work If I were out of reach of the printer's boy." They had left the main road in the valley, and were descending a steep hill to a ford la the river. The driving was difficult, and the colonel gave his entire attention to the horses as they slid down the rocky declivity, talking to them as if they understood his explicit directions. "So-o, now, there, Tolliver -there's n right smart chunk o' rock just ahead of you-step around it, my boy. You Janel never you mind about Tolliver: just pick up your own feet a little higher. Steady, now."

"You have pretty rough roads around here/' began Itingbrand, bracing him-self into his seat. "I should think-"

The interruption was an onlinous suap, and the horses stopped. "That sounded mighty like something broke," said the colouel, and they alighted and looked the carriage over earefully. "Yes, here it is, for sure," he continued; "tangue's broke off right here."

They examined the fracture, and Ringbrand angested wrapping It la splints with one of the halter-straps. "I reckon It wouldn't hold," said the olonel, "but we can try lt."

They spent some time trying to put the suggestion into practice, succeeding finally in making a clumsy splice, which the first pull of the horses disfointed hopelessly. "It's no use, Mr. Ringbrand," said the colonel; "we're in for it; there's nothing like a blacksmith shop this side o' Tregarthen."

Ringbrand looked at his watch and saw that it was half-past ten. "How far are we from the village, colonel?" he asked

"About eight miles, I recken." That seltled the question of departure for that day, and Ringbrand was nanoyed to find himself feeling rather father says one does what his ancestors jubilant than disappointed over the unavoidable delay. He helped the colonel anhlich, and after an hour's hard work they got the buggy to the top of the hill, re they left it at the side of the road and walked back to the nearest farmhouse, leading the horses. Since the colonel knew nearly every one in the valley, it followed that they had only to mention their need to objain the hospitality and assistance of the farmer, who lent them an antiquated carriage and refused to let them depart until after dinner. Addlag the delays to the time consumed in the careful driving necessary to the preservation of the farmer's vehicle in a state of entirety, it was near the middle of the afternoon when they got back to Tregarthen, and then Col. Latimer Insisted upon taking his companion up to the mountain for the remainder of the day. Ringbrand offered every reasonable objection he could think of, knowing that other visit to Hester would immeasurably increase the pain of leaving her; will insist upon throwing down the but in the end discretion was swept away by an overwhelming desire to see the last remaining petals of the rose,

Ringlannd gave up again, for the simde reason that he had no valid obetlon to offer, and half an hour later e was sitting on the vermida of "The Laurels," deep in the discussion of the race problem with the colonel a disussion in which the northern point of view fared indifferently because the mind of its advocate was too busy with questions suggested by the presence of Thester Latinier. All through the argument he was studying her face, searching therein for the proof or the contradiction of Mrs. Lanllow's assertion, and tormenting himself by trying o imagine what Hester would say if he hould tell her of his intended departire and the reason for it. After an early tea the colonel exensed simself, riding off with Henry to the west farm, a portion of the estate lying two miles farther back on the mountain. When they were left alone together, Ringbrand made a commendable effort to keep the stream of conversation flowlug in trivial channels; but his thoughts set so persistently toward the fend, and its bearing upon both their lives, that he had spoken of It almost before he knew what he was saving. "I should think it would be a constant source of anylely to you," he said, irrelevantly.

Riagbrand reflected a moment before answering. "Possibly my definition is not gulte sincere. I have always thought that the truest courage consisted in doing right when it is easier and safer to do wrong-in other words. that It requires a higher kind of courage to suffer lajury than to resent lt I'm beginning to suspect, however, that this test can be applied only to martyra and to cowards-to the latter, because they use it as a plea for nonresistance.

"I think that Is a little beyond my depth," replied Hester, snipping a rose from the clambering bush that covered the end of the veranda and beginning to trim the petals into dahlia-like pre elsion with her selssors. "I have always thought of a brave man as one who was simuly not afraid of anything: one of whom it could be said that he did pot know what fear was."

"That always seemed to me like dublous praise. If one doesn't know the sensation of fear, there can be little yirthe in being brave. To my mind, the man who realizes the danger and yet compels himself to face it, though it may be with pallid face and shaking knees, deserves the greater credit."

"I suppose that's true; only I never got that far into the subject before. I don't often reason about such things. because-I suppose you would say beeause a woman doesn't reason about anything; but it doesn't seem necesary; life lan't so much a question of motives us of deeds: It len't so much what one thinks as what one does. And

"In that ease I ought to be a brave man," sald Ringbrand, smiling; "my forefalhers were Scottlsh clansmen, and they haven't left n record of many other virtues." "Is your name Scotch?" "Yes; tradition has it that our anestors were the heralds of the clan. and that the name comes from their enstom of whirling a lighted brand in a circle as a aignal for the gathering of the hosts."

"How sweetly romantle! It sounds like a bit out of dear old Sir Walter. I should always believe that, whether it is true or not.

Ringbrand laughed shortly: "You have a true woman's admiration for valerous deeds, haven't you? A penceable man Garls himself rather out of the runniug."

She looked up in surprise at the ayaical outburst. "I think that's a little unklad," she said, quietly; "but if you challenge," she paused and trimmed off and talk with her once more, and he I "I don't begin to understand how any load of hay. Detroit Tribune,

He had known well enough what she would say, but the verbal confirmation of his conviction came to him like the sentence death to a criminal who has been proved guilty. He rose and walked the length of the verando, coming back to lean against the railing opposite her. Yon've said a hard thing, Miss Hester," ie began, "und I hope you'll forgive me for having provoked it. I wished to say something entirely different-to tell von sumething of myself-"

They both looked uround at the sound of horses' hoofs on the gravel of the avenue, and saw the colonel and his son and waited for him to finish. "It's of na consequence," he went on, "or, at least, you wouldn't think so now. Will you tell me good-by, Miss Latimer?" "Surely you are not going so early?"

"Yes, I think I'd better." "But we shall see you again soon, shan't we?" she asked. He was saved from replying by the entrance of the colonel, who protested
